As guitar DI signals are highly dynamic, set your recording input level so that even your most animated thrashing does not clip. Boost pedals may be great at saturating a valve amp input stage but they will crunch your interface buffer in an unholy manner, so proceed with caution. Guitar modelling plugins/apps expect a large dynamic range and a relatively low input level so try to keep your input peak level below -10dBFS.

As always, however, don't be overwhelmed by the visual cues - your ears should always be your guide for what sounds good in a guitar tone, or either a live or studio full-band mix. 50-60Hz: you might expect to hear the kick around this range, as well as bass and synths. Guitars generate noise in this range, but unless it's an extended-range instrument, you might find it interferes with the bass without actually adding to the sound.

The preamp is responsible for taking the relatively puny signal from an electric guitar, adding muscle to it, and determining both how clean, crunchy, or highly overdriven it is and its basic tonality — read: Bass, Middle, and Treble. In effect, it can be likened to a basic body-shaping gym that zones in on certain areas and adds muscle and/or bulk — but nowhere near enough strength for the signal to be able to move a speaker or set of speakers.

The guitar itself has to be reasonably light to ensure smaller shoulders can cope. It needs to be easy enough to play for small hands, with an appropriately-sized neck. And it needs to look cool. Because, let's face it, at that age the look of the guitar arguably trumps its ability to traverse multiple tonal areas.

Guitarleles are tuned higher than guitars. Their key is the same as a standard guitar's would be with a capo on the 5th fret. This can cause a bit of confusion if you're a guitarlele player looking to play along with a normal guitar. Like the uke, guitarleles are very trebly. They have a a very similar tone.
